John Singer Sargent's Works at the Met

The Metropolitan Museum of Art boasts an impressive collection of Sargent's works, showcasing his versatility and mastery of portraiture. Some of the most notable pieces in the Met's collection include:

Madame X (1884)

One of Sargent's most famous works, "Madame X," is a striking portrait of the socialite Madame Pierre Gautreau. The painting caused a scandal upon its debut due to the provocative pose and the subject's revealing gown. The work exemplifies Sargent's skill in portraying fabric and texture, as well as his ability to capture the essence of his sitters. This portrait remains a focal point in discussions about Sargent's career and the societal norms of his time.

The Daughters of Edward Darley Boit (1882)

This large-scale canvas depicts the four daughters of the American artist Edward Darley Boit in a domestic setting. The composition is notable for its unconventional arrangement and the way it captures the individuality of each girl. The painting is often celebrated for its modernist qualities, as it moves away from traditional portraiture norms to create a narrative within the composition.

El Jaleo (1882)

"El Jaleo" is a vibrant portrayal of a Spanish dancer, showcasing Sargent's fascination with Spanish culture. The painting is characterized by its dynamic movement and dramatic use of light. This work illustrates Sargent's ability to capture not just portraits but also scenes filled with life and energy.

Other Notable Works

In addition to the aforementioned pieces, the Met houses several other important works by Sargent, including:

- Portrait of Lady Agnew of Lochnaw: A celebrated portrait that captures the elegance and poise of Lady Agnew, renowned for its rich color and texture.
- The Wyndham Sisters: A striking depiction of the two sisters, showcasing Sargent's ability to capture familial bonds and individual personalities.
- Carnation, Lily, Lily, Rose: A beautiful depiction of two girls lighting lanterns in a garden, illustrating Sargent's mastery of landscape and figure.
